

Reasons the president doesn't have to be a "natural born Citizen"

The U.S. Constitution requires the U.S. president to be a "natural born Citizen" (Article II), defined at the time as a person with two citizen parents and born on U.S. soil. People say it no longer matters.

We already messed up with Obama so it no longer matters, what difference does it make now
The Constitution no longer counts, so much else of it is abrogated
The Constitution applies only to old times, these are modern times
If the Constitution still says that then it ought to be changed
The definition still matters, Dems and Reps are simply in violation, and nothing's done
Cruz is eligible because I say so and believe it, and I like him and he's best (candidate uber C)
Are we supposed to fall on our own swords again like good Republicans and elect a putz
Or throw the election to Hillary so we can be purists
One parent makes you nbC, it says so, I read it on the web, Cruz himself said so
Birth here makes you nbC , it says so, I read it on the web, or something
If you're a citizen you're a natural born citizen, there's no distinction
The Supreme Court said so more than once
The Naturalization Act of 1790 made it clear
Blackstone made it clear
British common law made it clear
If we disqualify a candidate today on nbC grounds it exposes BHO as ineligible
If we expose BHO we have an insurmountable constitutional crisis
The countless people liable to charges of misprision of treason will work to prevent any review
The courts, understanding the truth and dangers, will not grant standing, so there is no "there" there
It's already been to court repeatedly, you're wrong
So you know more than Katyal and Clements who wrote the definitive paper, do you
So you know more than the government's own Congressional Research Service report on this, do you
So if that's true, why hasn't it been in The New York Times

If "natural born Citizenship" (nbC) really didn't matter, there would be one reason—the real one. The fact is the definition of nbC is in writing and all the reasons offered serve to avoid an inconvenient truth—ineligible people are involved with the office of president of the United States.
